Dear FCC,

Michael Traho's proposal to establish a license-free service within a licensed service is not only a slap in the face to fellow Amateurs, but also a slap to the Commission who granted him his privileges in the first place. I assume that the establishment of the license-free Family Radio Service and the Multiple User Radio Service was designed to fulfill needs quite similar to those Mr. Trahos uses to attempt to justify his case. "Good will" can already be achieved on 462 MHz and 152 MHz. The long-established GMRS and Color dot users are already complaining about their new neighbors. Coupled with the fact that the 420-450 MHz band is quite popular with the Amateur Radio Service, I think that it would be prudent if the FCC ask itself this question before considering this proposal. "Does the cost of appeasing a potential smattering of overseas users outweigh the domestic friction that will ensue as a result?" If common sense prevails, the Amateur Radio Service will be left alone.

Sincerely,

George W. Salzmann, AB0SF
